

the 1990s, the number of people with a mental health problem has increased in the UK, and this is expected to continue in the future (Mental Health Foundation, 2006).

There is a growing awareness of the need to improve the lives of people with mental health problems, and a number of initiatives have been developed to address this need. One of the most prominent of these is the Mental Health Act 2003, which introduced a number of reforms to the way in which people with mental health problems are treated. One of the key aims of the Act is to improve the quality of care for people with mental health problems, and to ensure that they are treated in a way that is consistent with their rights and needs.

One of the ways in which the Act aims to improve the quality of care is by introducing a new system of independent monitoring. This system is designed to ensure that people with mental health problems are treated in a way that is consistent with their rights and needs, and that they are not subjected to unnecessary or inappropriate treatment. The system is based on the principle of independent monitoring, and is designed to ensure that people with mental health problems are treated in a way that is consistent with their rights and needs.

One of the key challenges facing the mental health system is the need to improve the quality of care for people with mental health problems. This is a complex task, and one that requires a number of different approaches. One of the most important of these is the need to improve the quality of care for people with mental health problems, and to ensure that they are treated in a way that is consistent with their rights and needs.
